- Honokons, September 26th, 1876,

THE Blue Book containing the correspondence respecting the Treaty between Japan and Corea has at length come to band. We have already published some extracts from it given in the London and China Express, and make a circuit of the world. there is little if anything more in it worth reproduction. There is, indeed, less original matter than usual in such documents, hardly a single tresh fact being given in it. In his rules of the Great Northern Telegraph Comlast communication to the Earl of DERBY, pany urgent messages can take precedence of However, foir HARRY KARKES MILKES SOT comments on the treaty which are worth a rassing notice. He says :- " The resemblance between this Treaty and the British Treaty of 1858 with Japan is remarkable. The omissions or differences are almost ontirely confined to those articles in the last-named Treaty which relate to the exchange of coin, with passing on him a bad dollar in exchange came and said the third had gone down under Custom House control, and similar subjects. for cash. The trenty which Japan has forced upon this most conservative of conservative people shows very distinctly that the Japanese imitative faculty extends beyond more copying of dress and manners; they have adopted the foreign treaties made with themselves as the models on which to construct one with Cores. In this there is nothing to cavil at It only illustrates their aptitude to learn, and eather reflects credit on them for willingness to adapt what is useful and practical from other nations. But they have not exhibited much consistency in their recent treaty. As is well known, the Japanese Government has lately complained very loudly of the extraterritorial clauses of the foreign treaties with Japan, and the question has also been rather warmly taken up by the native Press. It is wounding to Jananese pride, no doubt, that these clauses should remain in the treaties, as they consider that they imply a certain inferiority. But the Japanese Government, though rebelling against exterritoriality as applied to Japan, has been careful to stipulate, as Sir HARRY PARKES remarks, for the right of jurisdiction over its own people in Corea-It has also imitated foreign treaties in not making this right reciprocal, as the Foreign Minister explained to Sir HARRY PARKES that Article X. does not give the Coreans Surjediction over their people in Japan. Now the Japanese consider themselves on a higher allow their people to come under Corean
